

Why is the Humane Society of the United States Helping a Terrorist Group Raise Money?

On Saturday, a Humane Society of the United States vice president will deliver a keynote speech at a fundraiser for an animal-rights terrorist group.

The Humane Society of the United States claims to oppose violence in the name of animal rights. But on Saturday it's helping raise money for the Humane League of Philadelphia, an organization allied with a vicious, violent gang of convicted animal rights terrorists.

The Humane League of Philadelphia was founded as "SHAC Philly," a chapter of Stop Huntingdon Animal Cruelty (SHAC).

The FBI calls SHAC a "terrorist" group. Its tactics have included death threats, violent assaults, blackmail, and arson.

In 2006, SHAC was convicted on federal terrorism charges. Its national leaders remain in federal prison.

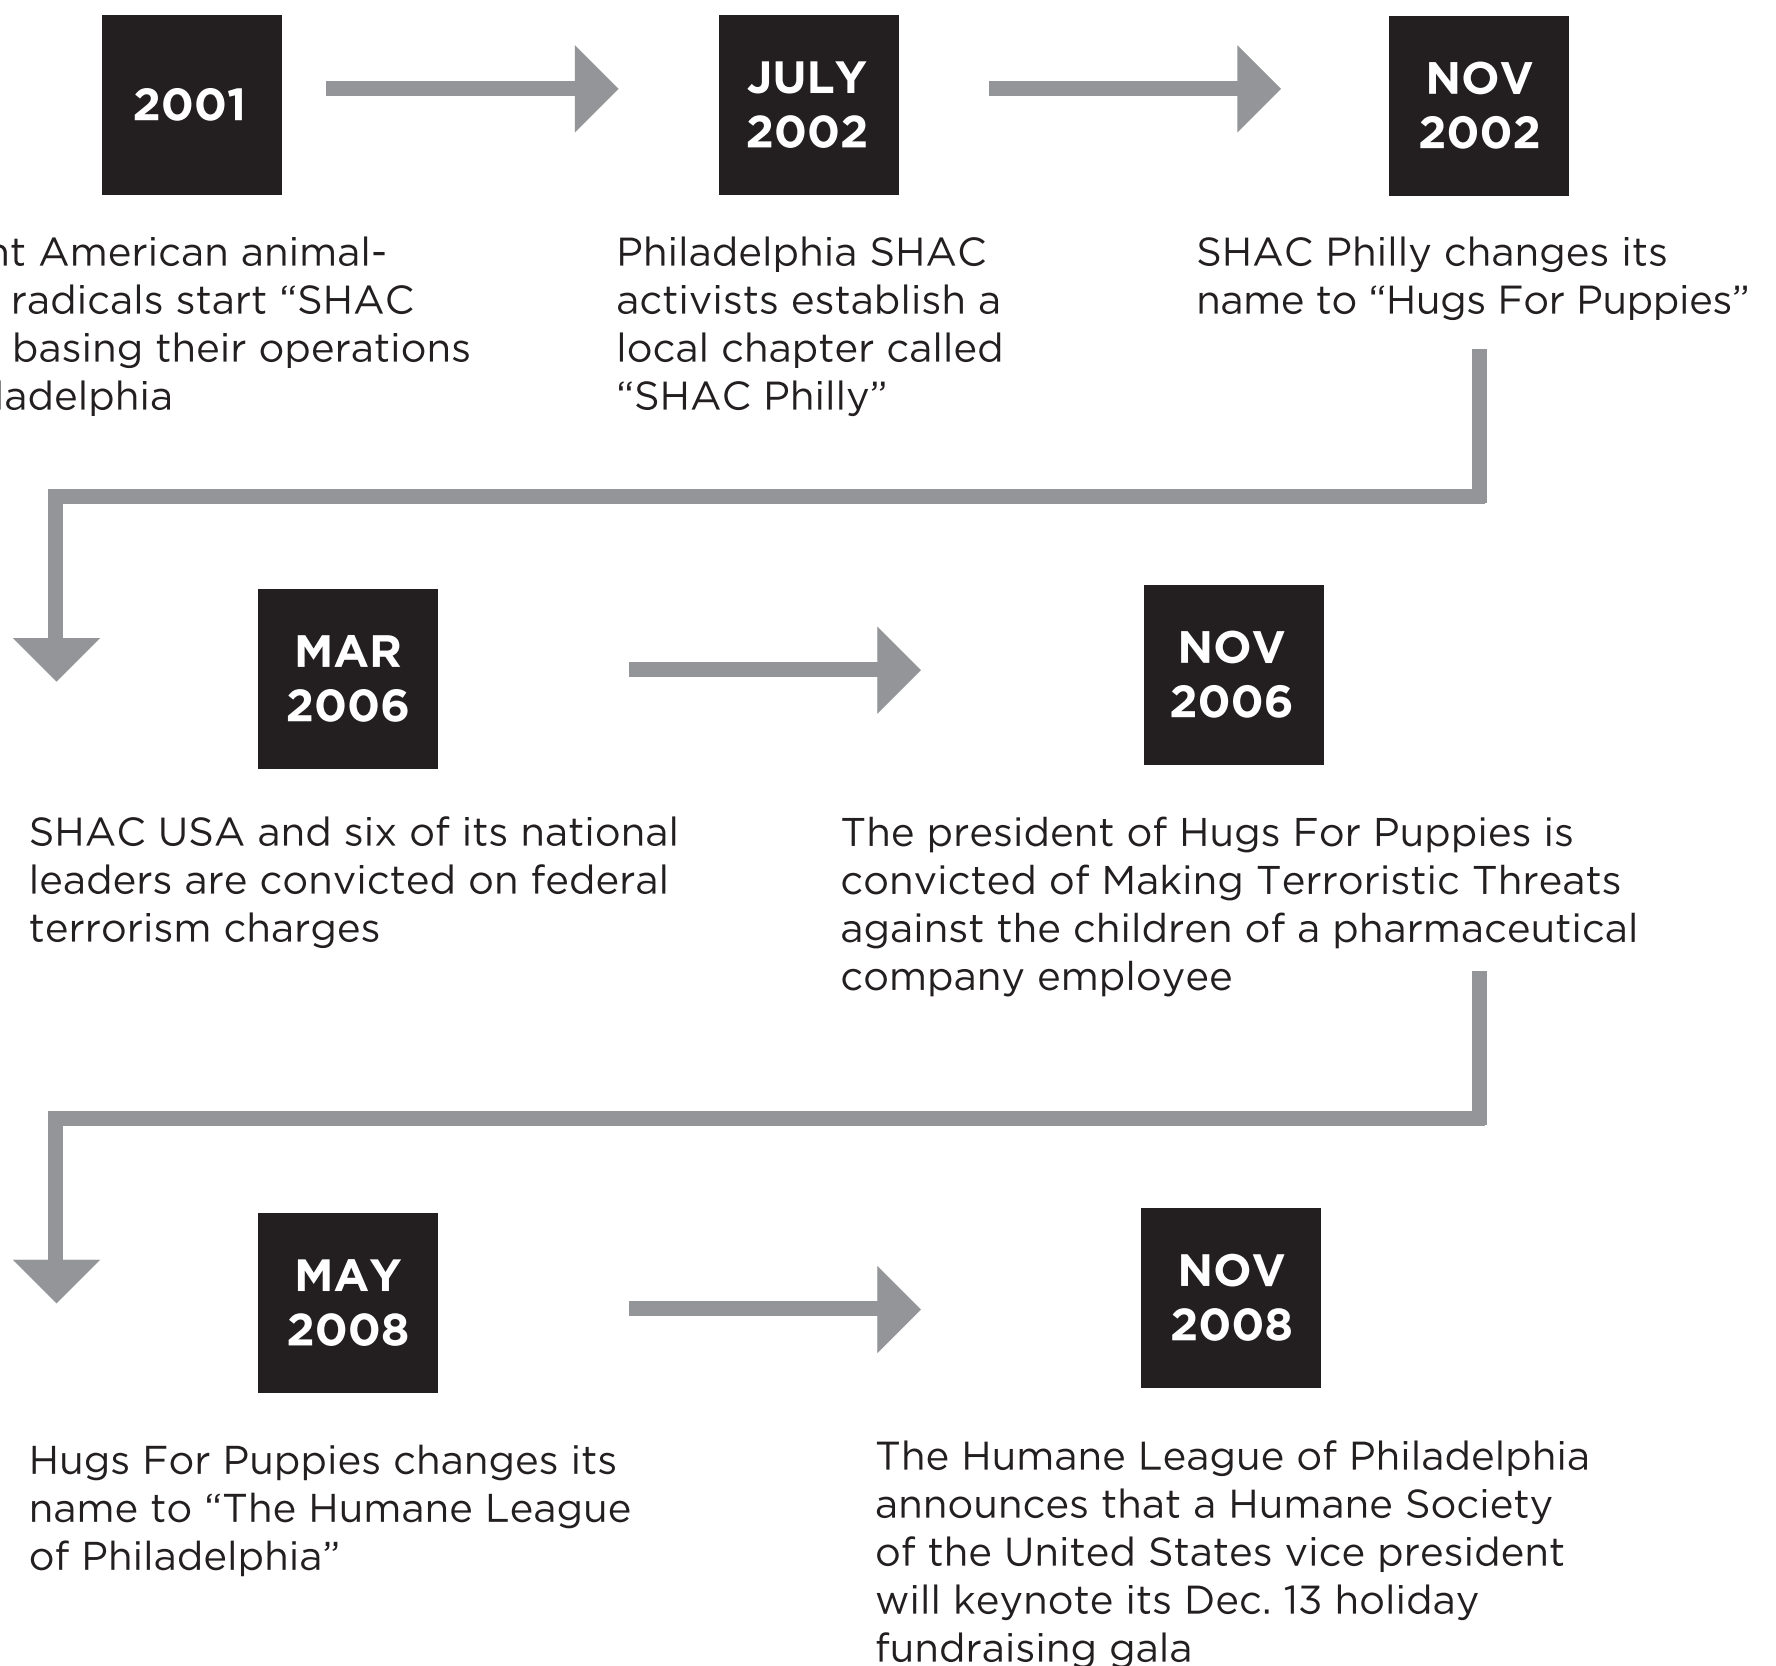

Also in 2006, the Humane League of Philadelphia's president was convicted of Making Terrorist Threats against an employee of a drug company.

According to media reports, he threatened to kill her children.

Judges have issued three different restraining orders against the Humane League of Philadelphia and its president, in order to protect biomedical research companies and their business associates from violence, vandalism, stalking, and identity theft.

The Humane League of Philadelphia is required by law to post these restraining orders on its own Internet home page.

The Humane Society of the United States claims to be a mainstream, peaceful advocate for animals. Why is it helping a terrorist group raise money?
